

As an amateur operator, I'm most disappointed that a proposal presented by the power industry (that recently let a large segment of the population down in the Northeast) would even be considered.

The ham radio community responded during the power outage to help people. No money was involved in this emergency effort. Operators donated their time and equipment to provide assistance.

I'm against this measure since it will ruin normal amateur communications across most, if not all, our allocated bands.

I hope you will consider supporting those that provide emergency help for free instead of the power companies in their search for more revenue.

Thank you for your time.
